negligee. It is so simple that even the warm weather will not discourage one from undertaking the making. It means almost no labor, in fact, and is so comfortable to wear and gives such a pleasant sensation of grace and charm that it more than repays the labor and time expended. In the pleture it is made from one of the thin Oriental silks showing a quaint flower design on a creamy white ground. The edges are hemstitched and the whole effect is one of summer-like simplicity, but you could make this negligee of a dosen different materials. It would be very charming made of a soft cotton voile or of cotton crepe, and it would be very pretty made of foulard, and crepe de chine or crepe meteor, either one would make up attractively. If you like the finish you could put lace on the neck and sleeves. The little bodice and skirt are made separately, then the bodice is shirred and arranged over the edge of the skirt and stitched into place, but if in place of stitching it into place it is faced to form a casing and there is ribbon or elastic inserted the negligee would be available for maternity use. For midsummer use a pretty effect can be obtained by using flowered cotton crepe and making the frill of lace, while lace frills also finish the sleeves and the neck. The lustrous slik crepe known as "Corean" is of nearly perfect weight for the summer negligee. It would be charming and in every way satisfactory in either white or color. Incidentally, it will be needed 7 yards of material 27 inches wide 5% yards 36, 5% yards 46; the skirt is 3 yards and 4 inches wide at the lower edge.
